The U.S. Air Force is accepting white papers under a broad agency announcement regarding the Advanced Battle Management System, the service branch's component of Combined Joint All-Domain Command and Control, or CJADC2. Through the BAA, the Air Force intends to "facilitate the rapid exploration and maturation of innovative technologies" that could support relevant ABMS/CJADC2 needs, such as:

- Networking capabilities
- Communications capabilities
- Artificial Intelligence
- Data sensing and analysis

Technologies and services acquired through the BAA should support operational decisions and efficient force employment.

The Space Development Agency is soliciting executive summaries, invited proposal abstracts and invited proposals to enhance its Proliferated Warfighter Space Architecture, a layered network of military satellites and associated elements designed to support joint warfighting missions with space-based capabilities. The recently released BAA identifies four main focus areas for the initiative:

- Efficient beyond line-of-sight data transport and warfighter communications
- Advanced/alternate position, navigation and timing
- Advanced target custody, warning, tracking and defeat
- Global battle management

The Department of Defense is soliciting responses to a BAA for research and development services regarding weapons of mass destruction. The BAA is designed to help the Defense Threat Reduction Agency and its DOD, U.S. government and international partners determine WMD-related challenges that could occur 5-10 years in the future. The main goals of this R&D project are:

- Preparing the U.S. and its partners to prevent, reduce and counter WMD and emerging threats
- Driving success over WMD-armed adversaries in crisis and conflict
